Why Did You Laugh?

Luis Angel López Salazar

The world hates the ones who do not belong to it. Mrs. Lucy did not want me to study computer science because she wanted to protect me. She loved me very much and did not want me to suffer. She said that that was not for me, but I did not understand her. She told me that people like me were very creative. I thought of a graphic program that I had written together with some high school friends in Pascal; but she told me that she was not referring to that, but to the other thing (my powers). In that time I used to send all my love to someone that I loved very much, who was very far from me and whom I missed very much. I needed to create in order to be happy, and I thought that technology was the perfect medium to express all my creativity. But everybody rejected me, they did not believe in me, and they closed their doors to me.

“Is anything impossible for the Lord?” (Genesis 18:14)

I remember that I was rudely interrupted by one of my classmates when I was presenting my project in computer science CS179 Database Management Systems “An XML Web Page Archiving System” in 2004, at the University of California, Riverside. He just shouted that it was not true, when I made a statement about Database Management technology. My professor just chuckled, instead of reprimanding him, because he did not believe me either. I just ignored him and continued with my presentation. Nobody tried to prove me wrong; and they would have failed if they had tried to anyway. This classmate could have waited until I had finished my presentation to ask his questions. But he just wanted to call me a liar and embarrass me in front of the whole class. That is why that day he did not learn something new.

Years later, after I was fired from Environmental Systems Research Institute for complaining about workplace harassment, I applied for many jobs. But most companies were very disappointed and did not want to hire me after I told them that I had been unjustly fired from my previous job, because they had a policy of not hiring anyone who had been fired, even if it was not his fault. I could not even confess to them that they had tried to murder me...

But there were three places that did not want to hire me for other reasons. At the first company I was asked to write a computer program from home to assess my skills. Then they gave me an appointment for a job interview at their offices. They were very impressed by my program, and therefore they could not believe that I had written it. Once the interview was over and I had left, one of the people who interviewed me told his colleagues that maybe I had paid someone to write it for me, and he mocked me because, according to him, I had wasted my money without being able to get the job. At the second company, one of my interviewers told me that they did not like to innovate. They liked to play it safe and be able to meet their deadlines. They said they did not value new ideas, while they carefully read a program that I had written in college with great interest and enthusiasm. And finally, in the third company they offered me a position without paying me a salary for my honest work, as if I were a slave. To this day, these stingy people continue to work in their small offices from 9 to 5.

I studied for many years and made many sacrifices in order to achieve my dreams and graduate as a computer scientist. But I could only work for a very short time as a computer engineer for Environmental Systems Research Institute, from August 16, 2005 to June 27, 2006. I spent three of those months in psychological therapy, unable to work, for all the damage that they did me, until I had to return to work, despite the professional opinion of my psychologist that I was not ready to go back to work, because my partner had left me, I was alone and I did not know what to do. Even after I returned to work, my psychologist wanted to continue seeing me because I was not well, but it was not possible because the insurance company objected because they did not want to continue paying for my medical treatment; it cared more about its money than my well-being. Back in that evil company, they continued to martyr me. They tried to kill me for fun. Since they could not do it, they fired me for having complained of harassment, without paying me for all my work, and they accused me of being a liar. Then they tried to kill me again, when I did not work for them anymore, to silence me. But all my suffering was worth it because I was able to fulfill the Holy Will of my Father. God sent me to the most horrible place to confront evil people who murdered their own employees to not pay them what they owed them. After making me suffer so much and destroying my life without mercy, they fired me without justification. “Your mission here has already ended. Now you have to be very strong ". (God Father) But God is very Merciful and Just. Whenever a door has been closed to me, a thousand others have been opened by His Divine Grace. "My child, I took away everything that you had, and now I will give you everything that you wanted and much more, because I want you to be happy." (God Father) Thank You for all my suffering, Lord. Your Blessed Happiness is what I love the most. Blessed be You forever.
